Understanding venous leg ulcers

Compression can be considered the cornerstone in the therapy of venous leg ulcers. As indicated by numerous studies¹, adequate compression supports venous flow and shows significant effects on deep venous haemodynamics – ultimately providing large improvements in pain, mobility and quality of life for the patient.

How do venous leg ulcers develop?

Chronic venous insufficiency is the underlying cause of a venous leg ulcer. The compromised blood flow to the heart is mainly caused by venous valve incompetence. The resulting reflux leads to an ambulatory venous hypertension which damages the capillaries making them more permeable. This allows fluid, proteins and blood cells to leak into the tissues. As a consequence, an adequate support of nutrients and oxygen to the skin is reduced, causing death of skin tissue and the development of a venous leg ulcer.

80% of lower extremity ulcerations are venous ulcers.²

Regular function of venous valves

Open valve: Blood can flow towards the heart.

Compression and stiffness factor:

Adequate compression is necessary when venous flow is impaired. As venous valves are compromised, a sustained compression at the ankle of 40 mmHg³ or more is the recommended pressure to support venous return.

At this point, the specific stiffness of a compression garment becomes a crucial factor. The higher the stiffness, the higher the working pressure and the effect of the muscle pump.

Compression provides the best conditions to heal the ulcer: the subsequent reduction of the local blood volume leads to lower venous reflux and the reduction of ambulatory venous hypertension.

Malfunction of venous valves

Deficient valve allows the venous blood to reflux.

onto the body from the outside with the muscles at rest, is called "resting pressure".

The pressure, exerted

"Working pressure" is exerted temporarily onto the body as the muscles are working and the diameter of the body part increases.
